Lovely weather lately.

Five o'clock sunsets. Subzero temperatures. Winter tornadoes.

Wait—that's not lovely at all.

Or is it...

Let a ray of sunshine in for Tempo Drop, a handsome bit of desk c=ndy in the form of some archaic weather-predicting technology, available now.

Yep, this is just your average teardrop-shaped snow globe endowed with pow=rs of meteorological clairvoyance. (That old story.) Charles Darwin actually used something lik= this during scientific voyages—so in a way, you're following in his footsteps here. E=cept instead of discovering evolution, you're just procuring the most awe-inspiring desk object since the d=inking bird.

Inside the orb is a mix of water, ethanol and something called camphor, wh=ch is apparently an embalming agent. (So maybe don't drink it.)

Now, while the "scientific community" doesn't consider t=is a "reliable" means of "weather prediction," we think you'll find it plenty effective. You&rsq=o;ll put it on your desk. The skies will darken. An intricate network of ice-like crystals will form. And you&rsquo=ll become a valued source of midday whimsy and pseudoscientific entertainment.

Kind of like a real weatherman.
