Hi Jeff,
Yes- I am suggesting a specific test for c1IN=. this would be an important lead for us, but isn't the only.
Best regards,
Jay

Hi=Jeff,
Bradykinin is an end product of C1inhibitor activity. Its possib=e to have normal bradykinin levels and still have a deficiency or gene iss=e with C1INH.
I would be more than happy to work with you =urther if you feel I can be of help. I am on the road often but if you wan= to meet in person, and/or discuss this in greater detail, I can put you in=touch with my assistant Mary Ann who can help facilitate our working toget=er in some manner.

Best regards,

Jeff,
It was nice to hear back from you. The problem with b=ing a "medical Sherlock" is that medical dilemmas are often too =easy for me to help solve. Regarding your issue : has anyone previously tes=ed you for a C1 inhibitor deficiency? This is what I suspect may be =he culprit for several of your symptoms, and if you haven't been teste=- please do so at your earliest convenience.

Once we know =he answer as to whether this is the 'smoking gun", we can discuss=further what we can do together. We can also address the elevated triglyce=ides, etc

BTW, I'm sure Perry mentioned that this is often what I do while pretending to have a real job at Genomind. At some point in my life(maybe soon), I may need to be focused on helping clients directly again.

Sincerely,
Jay
