Hi Jeff,

Bradykinin is an end product of C1inhibitor a=ctivity. Its possible to have normal bradykinin levels and still have a def=ciency or gene issue with C1INH.

I would be more than happ= to work with you further if you feel I can be of help. I am on the road o=ten but if you want to meet in person, and/or discuss this in greater detai=, I can put you in touch with my assistant Mary Ann who can help facilitat= our working together in some manner.

Best regards,

Ja=

Jeff,

It w=s nice to hear back from you. The problem with being a "medical Sherl=ck" is that medical dilemmas are often too easy for me to help solve.=Regarding your issue : has anyone previously tested you for a C1 inhibitor=deficiency? This is what I suspect may be the culprit for several of=your symptoms, and if you haven't been tested- please do so at your ea=liest convenience.

Once we know the answer as to whether t=is is the 'smoking gun", we can discuss further what we can do to=ether. We can also address the elevated triglycerides, etc

BTW, =m sure Perry mentioned that this is often what I do while pretending =o have a real job at Genomind. At some point in my life( maybe soon), I ma= need to be focused on helping clients directly again.
