I took some time to overthink your messages:

So first you say your best student achieved bliss which is by definition complete happiness, isn't it? Then you say something that makes one happy - happiness - is cheap like sweet candy and not good enough as it does not get one thinking, don't you? But then you state that everything is like candy, which by definition is out-of sugar, which is sweet, even if there exist different variations of candy. So the achievement of your best student is also like candy - isn't it? - which is not good enough and therefore not really an achievement, or is it? So what gets one thinking if everything is like candy?

You are having way too much candy. You want more and more as you get bored by the taste easier and faster, it is a vicious circle. this is not a question , it is a conclusion. and a waste of your time
