According to Seth, we're all hallucinating all the time; when we agree about our hallucinations, we call it "reality." Assuming that the activity of billions of brain cells is what produces our four-dimensional picture of reality (three dimensions of space plus the dimension of time), basic things like a sense of self aren't real in themselves. Neuroscience says we are all a mass of mixed-up perceptions, memories, expectations, and flawed brain processing (like a computer whose software can't keep up with a flood of data coming in), and therefore we can't trust the brain's hallucinations. In our first post, we pointed out that the chemicals and electrical charges in the brain are not special; they follow simple laws of chemistry and physics that apply to rocks, trees, and clouds. If the mind produces the brain, we don't have this problem, since the experience of a physical thing can easily be a mental phenomenon—think of all the "physical" objects in your last dream. [...] This whole dilemma is
