I'm confused. You did an experiment with 200 girls whe=e you held their hands and rating them? Or that's what you're sugg=sting for me?

Jeffrey,

Just an additional thought. A vision, actually--

What-if I did readings blindfolded? So I held someone's hand and felt into =hem. With such limited visual/tactile information, it would be a real test=of my empathic abilities. It would almost validate "the sixth sense.&=uot;

Then maybe we could compare my ability to re=d people with an average person's ability to read people?

Just brainstorming here...

Hi Jeffrey and G=no,

Earlier today, I sat down with 15 pictures and 15 n=mes and tried to match them. It turned out to be quite a struggle -- prima=ily because people were very similar. For instance, I'd have descripti=ns like this:

Shy but relatively happy on the out=ide
Filled with frustration and anxiety
Burning with r=ge deep down

But out of the 15 people, that could=vaguely describe 3 or 4 them. So my matching ending up looking like a conv=luted chart.

What I concluded was that I ne=d a bit more help designing this experiment. Ideally, rather than matching=15 names to pictures, I have a bunch of binary decisions (A or B). One wou=d expect me to get 50% right. IF the people are emotionally different enou=h (happy v. sad, for instance) I hypothesize I will do considerably better=than chance. Does that make sense?

I have started=to go down this road with my friend at NYU. Happy to discuss with Gino as =ell.

And of course, happy to submit to MRI =achines and the like to figure what's happening on that end.

Open to any and all thoughts. Science, clearly, is not my g=ft.

Very best,
David

Sorry it took a beat to respond.

This =eekend, when I have space and time, I'll ask a friend to lay out some =ictures and names and see how I do. And I'll report back what I learn.=C2◆

I've been thinking about this for a while -- and I do feel w= ultimately need a more rigorous experiment. But I like your idea, at leas= to start, of just giving it a good and seeing.

Great meeting you.
