"I have been proud to consider the Department of Justice to be my professional home, and while I am deeply honored to have been considered a candidate for Attorney General, I have informed the President that I have carefully decided to remove my name from his further consideration. I strongly believe that the Attorney General of the United States serves quite a unique role in the President's cabinet, and must be perceived by all, to be free of conflict. As a result of my former role as Counsel to this President and given the current political climate, I believe any perception or mis-perception of the lack of total independence would not best serve the President, the Justice Department's, or the country's interest at this time, and I have so informed the President."
