What I am referring to, is it is important to have links (especially from established historical site, which are weighted by google search engines) to your site, i.e., Jeffreyepsteinscience.com.

First, the site needs to be populated with real original content that is fresh, and constantly uploaded.

Second, there needs to be lots of links and references to it from established sites.

We are building the links now. If our links are greater than the links that the present articles have, they get pushed out. That's the basis of it.

Now, Wikipedia has been quite troublesome, as we are not only trying to edit your page (which they just put back the material), even when it is done quietly. We have also added links to your website to the wiki pages of Lee Smolin, Martin Novak, myself (they let that one stay), Howard Gardner, Institute for Evolutionary Biology, Harvard, etc., and they remove them.

I have added links to your website to all my references, videos, talks, etc., which are quite substantial throughout the web.

In the Phillipines, they are building their own links, which they can't touch, and that will drive it, these will be finished this week.

Changes can go very fast, and even though you don't see much of a change, it can happen, just like a phase transition. Poof, its gone.

Our charity site is already on the first page of a google search, but this needs that information from Sarah asap, which I asked for two days ago, and without it, it will get dumped by the engines.

They have undone all our edits on sites with Marvin Nowak, Howard Gardner, etc., and all within an hour, thanks to "google alerts" on your name.
