Subject: do you think

That I realistically have any skills that would allow me to thrive outside the foundation?
I know that I always ask but now I am serious - it's budget and planning time for next year and it would be irresponsible of me to set up a plan and then desert the foundation. I would not want to do that.

Of course I can always go back to medicine full time and I have so many research ideas that I want to pursue, I could spend lots of time thinking about those.

I just feel like I've worked hard/lots of experience and maybe should do something bigger. Or big.

It has to be concrete. As I woman, I don't get many chances without getting the "flaky" label.
