Each man has his own kazoo. Are you sure you don't call kazoo the stuff you don't like and call classical the stuff you like. That would explain much of the world's xenophobia, especially if it is a built-in trait that was at some moment in time adaptive, and even more so if it was coupled with altruism towards one's own kind (however defined) and exo-altruistic behavior just an escaped mutation of all this that occurs because the building in man of altruism is too far and too complex to go, and the fact that I admire the kazoo-enjoyer in tom, and am embarrassed by the girl I rejected after finding her in all particulars (including sampled physical) valuable and got stuck solely on the words thirty-six, how foolish and fetishistic. And how wrong to elevate it to classics appreciation.

And it is not an accident that I gave this answer to this question and not to the strictly kazoo-istic one. Or is that spelled casuistic?
