I feel like it'd be good to talk it out? I say what=I can do, and somebody who knows science tells me how we can test that, un=il we arrive at a solution that works both ways?

Jeffrey,

Just an additional thought. A vision, actually--

Just brainstorming here...

I wo=ld love to do that. Definitely has higher probability of success.

Hi Jeffrey and Gino,

E=rlier today, I sat down with 15 pictures and 15 names and tried to match t=em. It turned out to be quite a struggle -- primarily because people were =ery similar. For instance, I'd have descriptions like this:

=br>

Shy but relatively happy on the outside

Filled wit= frustration and anxiety

Burning with rage deep down

<=r>

But out of the 15 people, that could vaguely describe 3 or 4 =hem. So my matching ending up looking like a convoluted chart.

=div>

What I concluded was that I need a bit more help design=ng this experiment. Ideally, rather than matching 15 names to pictures, I =ave a bunch of binary decisions (A or B). One would expect me to get 50% r=ght. IF the people are emotionally different enough (happy v. sad, for ins=ance) I hypothesize I will do considerably better than chance. Does that m=ke sense?

I have started to go down this road wit= my friend at NYU. Happy to discuss with Gino as well.

And of course, happy to submit to MRI machines and the like to =igure what's happening on that end.

Open to a=y and all thoughts. Science, clearly, is not my gift.

=div>Very best,
David

Hi Jeffrey,

Sorry it took a beat to respond. =C2

This weekend, when I have space and time, I'll ask a friend to lay out some pictures and names and see how I do. And I'll report back what I learn.

I've been thinking about this for a while --and I do feel we ultimately need a more rigorous experiment. But I like your idea, at least to start, of just giving it a good and seeing.

Great meeting you.
David

david, if you can do the name to photo test. in a 25 picture test. it could be an interesting beginning, I suggest you take twenty women available on google or facebook and try. ,
