Hi Jeff,

Bradykinin is an end product of=C1inhibitor activity. Its possible to have normal bradykinin levels and st=ll have a deficiency or gene issue with C1INH.

I would be =ore than happy to work with you further if you feel I can be of help. I am=on the road often but if you want to meet in person, and/or discuss this in=greater detail, I can put you in touch with my assistant Mary Ann who can =elp facilitate our working together in some manner.

Best regards=

Jeff,

It was nice to hear b=ck from you. The problem with being a "medical Sherlock" is that=medical dilemmas are often too easy for me to help solve. Regarding your i=sue : has anyone previously tested you for a C1 inhibitor deficiency? ♦=A0 This is what I suspect may be the culprit for several of your symptoms,=and if you haven't been tested- please do so at your earliest convenie=ce.

Once we know the answer as to whether this is the '=smoking gun", we can discuss further what we can do together. We can =Iso address the elevated triglycerides, etc

BTW, I'm sure Pe=ry mentioned that this is often what I do while pretending to have a real =ob at Genomind. At some point in my life(maybe soon), I may need to be fo=used on helping clients directly again.
