Dear Jeffrey,

While in SF, I have met Robert McIntyre (the CEO of Nectome) and spent =n evening with him. I got the impression that he is sincere and smart, =ut Nectome is just a two people show at this point, with a 2M runway. =obert hopes to be able to extract information about mental states from =is preserved nervous tissue in a few years from now. I don't believe =hat they have a meaningful shot at reviving people, but then, nobody =eally does. While Robert seems to believe in his mission, I think that =heir market could be high end tissue preservation for forensics, =edical diagnostics and neuroscience research. At the moment, they seem =o be trying for the much smaller market of transhumanist funeral rites, =ut since they only share it with Alcor even that might work out.

Unrelated: what do you think about Jim O'Neill?

Cheers,
