Indeed. At least everyone can be=focused on one set of signed documents and the parties can send signed/init=aled red-lines back and forth. I think Boris should make whatever cha=ges he wants to the documents, let's just narrow the areas of disagreement,=so Boris and David can find some acceptable middle ground and be done with i=. So, while Boris' changes may be significant, I think it's better to=limit the number of changes to as few as possible. I am personally in=different on the promissory note concept, but I am obviously not in charge h=re. Talk to you both soon. Peter

Hey,

=o, I forwarded your email to David and we discussed. In addition to t=e fact that the proposal was unsigned by Boris (but let's leave tha= aside), David doesn't like the note structure because his attorney= believe he will have more protection as the general partner of a new vehic=e that actually owns the shares. Rather than potentially obtaining a jdgment and having to collect from Boris personally.

David would like Boris to choose one of the two offers he submitted=to Gunderson, based on Gunderson's original framework (the one you s=nt to me and then I sent it to David and then his attorneys edited it and t=en David signed it and sent it to Gunderson). He expects Boris to cho=se one of those structures, make a counter proposal, initial his changes, s=gn the document and have Gunderson send it back to David.

At this point, I would really like to limit my involvement and the t=me I spend on this. So, if you think Boris can work with you and his a=torneys to counter one of David's proposals in writing, I think tha= would be best and most efficient. It's all the same economic= anyway.
