Here's best answer I found on quora for eye color, which I copy and paste=below:

<http://www.quora.c=m/Does-the-color-of-ones-eye-serve-a-purpose-in-the-ability-to-see-Is-it-ev=lutionarily-advantageous-to-have-green-or-blue-eyes> <<http://www.quora.com/Does-the-co=or-of-ones-eye-serve-a-purpose-in-the-ability-to-see-Is-it-evolutionarily-a=vantageous-to-have-green-or-blue-eyes>>

Brown eyes p=otect the retina from harmful uv-light, much the same as dark skin protects=you from skin cancer in sunny climes. However, this comes at a price, the m=elanin blocks some visible spectrum light from entering the eye too; particu=arly light towards the blue end of the spectrum. This means it is harder to=see at night, as it means you cannot see the predominant wavelengths of the=visible spectrum that are still shining, at say twilight. In areas where in=winter it may be night for 12 hours a day or longer, good night vision is c=ucial, and uv protection less so - hence scandinavia is famous for blue eye=.

Blue eyes are eyes with a relative absence of pigmen=ation; green I imagine is just a happy medium between blue and brown, offer=ng some of the advantages of both. A complete absence of pigment in the eye=causes red eyes (as you can see all the blood vessels). This is seen in alb=nos.

As an interesting aside, ninjas actually wore blu= at night, not black, to exploit the fact this is the predominant colour th=t one can see at that time, and so they blend in better than if they had wo=n black as is commonly portrayed.
