If you are going to keep the two seats installed most of the time in the aft area (across from the berthing divan), then I would do the same detail in that ledge.

If you are not going to keep the two seats installed in the aft, then I would let ledge remain all wood.

My thought is that with the two seats removed, it will draw attention to the fact that the seats are not installed.

Your thoughts?

Just got out of a meeting where we all discussed what would look best and they agreed with me.<=u>

My strong opinion is it should be leather-

The only thing that could bag the edge is the seat - leather to leather. If you are worried about banging, the leather to leather would protect the seat better than a hard, unforgiving material like wood or metal.

It will coordinate with the conference table detail

Metal in that area will be too much. You already have 2 metal cup holders and metal switches. More metal will turn a detail accent into a focal point.

Matching the hardwood (color and grain) that run length is going to look a bit piece-mealed.<=u>

I really believe that the detail in the leather to coordinate with the conference table is the way to go...<=

The attached drawing illustrates the look=that will allow us to keep the seats as is and gains you 2" of aisle clearance between the seats in the fwd club area.

I think it will look great and compliment the new conference table detail.
