That sounds right to us.

Noam

I anticipate being able to spend som= time on this over the weekend, along with reviewing the drafts of your es=ate planning documents. Once I have sent the memo to you we can discuss y=ur thoughts and we can then respond to Max. Unfortunately this is a diffic=lt situation, not simple and straightforward, because of the terms of the =rust and fiduciary law applicable to trusts. Please see my email of 10/17=for an explanation of some of the issues.

>

> In some situations a trust is drafted so that you would have the right to=remove and replace the trustee, and in doing so perhaps find a trustee tha= would not inquire so diligently as to your personal financial circumstanc=s before making a principal distribution to you. In this regard, please r=fer to my email of 10/17 where I summarize the trustee removal, resignatio= and appointment provisions. The trustees can both resign at any time. Thee= appoint successors subject to your approval. If they agree to resign you =an find a new independent trustee whom they can appoint. If not, you can r=move them but only with the approval of a majority of your children. Do yo= think your daughters would agree to remove Max and Harry? If so you could=then appoint a successor. You would need to find an independent trustee. = can help you craft a letter to your daughters if you think they might agr=e to do this.

>

> My one additional thought right now that I need to review more closely is=that Harry, not being the independent trustee, should not have a say in th= distribution decision. If there is nothing in the trust to contradict thi= interpretation (I need to review the trust again) then Max alone has the =ower. However this would likely not change the analysis that Max believes =e needs to go through since he is accountable to all beneficiaries. He be=lieves he needs some level of financial information from you but in my view=that does not need to be detailed. I can discuss with him what level of d=tail would satisfy him; however, if my understanding is correct that you d= not wish to provide him with any backup for his distribution decision, th=n we should evaluate the removal option and any other strategies I may be =ble to come up with.

>

> Unfortunately this is not a simple situation and I will do my best to out=ine some additional options for you. In the meantime please let me know yo=r thoughts regarding the above. I am available for a call as well, at you= convenience.
