The choice:

(1) I decline the job soon and the press will report that I was his first choice but I declined for personal/timing reasons.

(2). I say I will do it knowing that there will be significant personal/financial/reputational costs because I like a good fight, I am loyal, and I am the best person for the job.

One of my colleagues described the relationship this way: like a race car driver to a fan belt. The fan belt is critical to the race car driver's needs and he can't exist as a race car driver without it. But, eventually, every fan belt gets worn out and breaks, and the driver throws it out, replaces it with a new fan belt, and gets back in the car.
