It is toward the middle of the room in front of where the heavy table is. It is fairly significant. It's going to bug me every time I see it. Of all the rooms, this one especially should be flawless.

I can also see a faint long dark streak. Maybe you can see it in the photo. Not sure if it's a rub mark also from the furniture, a wheel mark, or if it just wasn't clean before they added the two extra coats. It seems to be beneath the finish.

Sir,

The floors have been wet from the floor guys adding coats to the floor, thus the limitation of access for Reefco. It can't be walked on when wet.

A scratch is in the floor of the master from when our guys moved furniture out. The flooring guys tried to fix and coat over it, but it is still visible. Luis said the only way to fix it is to sand the floors uniformly back down, then start over with the polyurethane. Do you want me to have them fix it? If so, then completion of the master will be delayed by at least a week. If not, we can put the master back together Monday and get Reefco back in ASAP. I believe they'll need three days.

Also, I asked Luis about the discoloration around the ed=es. He said this is caused by moisture condensation in the walls (the wall= are sweating due to temperature variances from outside to inside). He sai= they have a matching paint that they can use to go around the edges with = thin line to blend this in. Again, this will take more time.
