If the Braque doesn't sell or the hammer price is $4.5 million or less, you get $4.5 million, so you pay no commission. If the hammer price is $5 million, for example, you get $4.875 ($4.5 guarantee plus 75% of the amount by which the hammer price exceeds the guarantee). If the hammer price is higher than the guarantee, you effectively pay a commission equal to 25% of the overage.

On the Giacometti if you go with the enhanced hammer instead of the guarantee you will receive the full amount of the hammer price plus an extra 10% of the hammer price (up to proceeds of GBP 20 million, then an extra 7% once proceeds exceed 20). Christie's not only isn't charging you a commission, they are paying you a portion of the buyer's premium that they collect from the buyer (of which they normally keep 100%). The downside, of course, is that if the Giacometti does not reach the reserve (the minimum price that you set which can't be more than the low estimate), it won't sell and you won't receive anything other than the sculpture back.
