Narcissists hold (perhaps "embrace" would be = better term) an exaggerated sense of self-importance. They overrate the signif=cance of their achievements and talents. And they expect to receive acc=lades for what they believe are outstanding personal attributes and acc=mplishments. They tend to be totally absorbed in fantasies of success, power, =brilliance, beauty, and other achievements and qualities. They believe they a=e special; as a result, they believe they can only be understood an= appreciated by people who are -- or organizations that are -- also special.</=>

Consequently, narcissists have unreasonable expectations of peop=e and situations. They feel they are entitled to favorable treat=ent and unquestioning compliance with their hopes and expectation=. Other people are supposed to acquiesce to their wishes.

Further, they exploit friends, acquaintances, and associates, ta=ing advantage of others to secure their own desires. They tend to be =aughty and arrogant, convinced that others are, or should be, envious of=them.

While every narcissist does not display each and every one of th=se characteristics, every narcissist exhibits enough of them to be d=fficult to deal with.
