FYI

Responding to ano=her physicist who said "None of you seem capable of rational objectiv= critical thinking on this topic of consciousness as a physical phenomenon="

Response

"That's =ecause it isn't, and everyone here (apparently save one) is rational a=d objective enough to understand that. Physical phenomena, and phenomena i= general, are ultimately perceptual in nature and subject to observational replication - =hat's why they call physics an empirical science. But consciousness is=not.

Consciousness cannot be objectively, replicably observed. Its putative physical correlates, including brains and behaviors, can be replicably observed, and it can be subjectively apprehended by any conscious entity. But that's it. Anyone who denies this understands neither physics nor consciousness, and has a severe logic problem to boot, inasmuch as he/she cannot properly distinguish between cognition and perception or internal and external state.

This isn't "polemics". This is just the way it is. Stop overreaching.</>
